

Displacement

When large numbers of marine renewable energy devices (or “arrays”) are placed in the ocean, they may cause animals such as large migratory fish or whales to avoid the area or be displaced from it. For example, whales may need to swim longer and farther to go around arrays of devices. There are currently no large arrays in the ocean, but scientists are already beginning to study this to understand the ways marine animals could be affected.

